Passenger Traffic War.

According to all rumors a lively war for the traffic between Hilo and the Volcano House is to be waged in the near future, with the Volcano Stables on the one hand and the Volcano House and the Hilo Railroad Company on the other. The trouble seems to have arisen from the fact that many tourists prefer to make the trip from Hilo to the volcano and return by automobile, all the way, instead of taking the train to Glenwood and then transferring to the auto-bus. The railroad people, it is understood, charge that the Volcano Stables has been drumming up this trade to their detriment, and now propose to retaliate by going into the automobile business themselves. It is understood, though no authority can be definitely stated, that the Hilo Railroad Company and the Volcano House have combined to purchase two one and a half ton trucks which are to be operated between Glenwood and the volcano, cutting down the rates by one dollar from the price which is now charged by the stables.

As far as can be ascertained, the Volcano Stables are taking no action as yet, though it is rumored that they have obtained a lease of ground in the vicinity of the Volcano House upon which they will erect their own stables, tearing down those which are now in use on the Volcano House lease. Manager Wright declined to have anything to say for publication, stating that he had only heard rumors that such a combination was planned, and that it had not come to him officially in any way.

NEWSPAPER MAN DESCRIBES.

Consuls Form a Guard.

"The Consuls, therefore, requested permission to form a body of special militia to defend their residences. They added that this measure probably would be insufficient, and the referee asked me, if possible, to occupy the town and environs.

"At four o'clock on the afternoon of October 5th, 1600 sailors took possession of the environs of the town and entrenched themselves there. Turkish troops are four hours' march from the coast and are encamped there. The Vail is with them.

"This morning I sent ashore Admiral Borea as Governor-General of Tripoli, at the same time sending a messenger to the office of the Vail, stating that I had taken possession of Tripoli in the name of the King of Italy. I begged him to leave the town as soon as possible and return to Constantinople. The Vail's office, however, was found to be unoccupied."

American Prevents Panic.

The American Consul, John Wood, maintained a position of perfect neutrality, but every one here agrees that his attitude prevented a panic in the town when the approaching bombardment was officially announced.

The Turkish authorities asked the Consuls if they wished to leave the town. A few were for leaving, but the majority decided to remain. Their reply was drawn up by Wood, who was the first to sign the French text. He communicated to the Vail the fact that the Consuls would not leave, and this greatly reassured the population.

As soon as the Turkish troops had abandoned the town the inhabitants went for advice to the various Consuls. Wood, for instance, was able to prevent a large petrol depot of the Societe-Italo-Americana from being sacked.

The Turks maintained order in the town as long as they remained, forbidding access to the consulates. The Arabs appeared to look upon the arrival of the Italians as a deliverance. The bombardment threw the town into a state of stupor. The European women were terribly frightened, and even the men confess to having received a severe nervous shock.

Shells Fall Into Town.

Several shells fell into the town. One six-inch shell fell near the American consulate. Wood had just left the veranda on the premises of the Eastern Telegraph Company when a fragment of the shell crashed through the window.

Traces of the bombardment are clearly visible, particularly at Sultan and Hadidie forts, where everything was swept away by the fire. The artillerymen were literally flattened to the wall by the projectiles. Human debris is strewn about the works. One physician told me he had attended to twelve wounded and another to ten.

The Arabs showed great curiosity at the spectacle, which put the Turks to flight. As soon as the troops were withdrawn from the town, the Arabs began frantically pillaging the Turkish officers' residences. Even chairs were carried away. The landing of the Italians was urgently needed to stop the looting, which was assuming alarming proportions. The Italians did not meet with any serious resistance on their occupation of the town.
